

These passages should explain each other, but any explanation I can suggest is unsatisfactory; the chains and bonds may be simply guarantees and obligations, because the conclusion which follows the last quoted passage states that the writer aggregated these men to the people of Babylon, under restrictions.

 ṣapinat zairi ina uqqum labbi-ya artakab; in my lofty war-chariot, the sweeper of enemies, in the vengeance of my heart I drove.—Sen. T. v. 57.

 za'iri mada ustesir ma nisi ustammih; the rebellious I rejected, I burned; the lowly greatly I have strengthened [or the poor I have enriched], and the people I have rejoiced.—E.I.H. ii. 25.

I now think that zairi of the first extract is a variant spelling of zayari. See p. 338.

 diʔi abni ma eri kirib-su asbuk; by the command of the god a strong storehouse I built, and metal in it I accumulated.—Neb. Yun. 79.

See parallel passage in p. 224, under Diddi. In that passage I had forgotten the value of $\rightarrow\text{I} \Xi\text{I}$, "myself," and translated "by command of the god," instead of "by my own wish." Probably we have the same intention here, and ΞI may have been omitted by inadvertence. Read 79 for 71 in the note there. I find multa accepit in Castell as a value of za'afa in the eighth conjugation.
